Dear Dick,

Thanks for the valuable miscellany. I note on the excerpt from the SS Marina interrogation that this is what I said in WWII, first chapter. That is not just released, as Lifton says, and is better examined in the context of the revelant SS reports, which I also have. So we are agreed on the greater dependability.

I am not satisfied that the translations, so often interpolations and interpretations, are dependable. I suggest that there is little likelihood Buell was home during the working day and that Ruth's story is more credible. I am not saying Marina here lied. I just think it got garbled.

Because I agree on the potential significance of this source, may I suggest that, in the light of what we have since learned, you first reread my chapter then compare with what you see in the full text. Not only may you see what I then didn't but perhaps some of what I included may trigger other things in your mind.
